The Butterfly Children charitable foundation provides comprehensive support to children with the rare genetic condition epidermolysis bullosa (EB). According to global statistics, one child in 50-100 thousand is born with EB. The condition is caused by a genetic mutation resulting in a deficit of the protein responsible for bonding skin layers together: the slightest physical injury – indeed, sometimes no physical contact is needed – creates blisters on the child's skin, which then flakes and exfoliates, leaving an open wound which must be constantly bandaged and protected from further damage. In some sufferers, this blistering can also occur in the mucus membranes. People with EB are sometimes called "butterflies", a metaphorical reference to their sensitive skin being like the wings of a butterfly.

For now, epidermolysis bullosa is an incurable condition. However, prompt diagnosis and correct treatment with dressings can prevent suffering and allow children with EB to lead a normal life.

Butterfly Children was set up in 2011, and one of the charity's principal objectives is to establish a system of medical assistance for EB sufferers in Russia. Thanks to the fund's efforts, EB was added to the country's list of rare diseases at the end of 2011 – prior to this, the condition was not officially recorded. In January 2015, the charity opened the first and, for now, only medical facility for butterfly-children in Russia, based in the country's leading institution for pediatrics, the National Medical Research Centre for Children's Health. The children supported by the charity come from all over Russia for comprehensive examination by specialists in a range of fields, and to receive the necessary treatment and care.

Currently, Butterfly Children helps over 300 children with EB.

The charity is a member and Russia representative of the DEBRA International association.

MUSIC

Olympic Brass

One of St Petersburg's oldest brass ensembles brings together musicians from the classical and jazz schools, while their main repertoire is drawn from music composed for Russian and foreign cinema. Classical music and jazz, latin melodies and bossanova, balkan ballads, klezmer and funk are all thrown together in unique signature arrangements, and the group's energy and performance would be the envy of the most boisterous ska-punk outfit.

The Ruslan Tustanovsky Quartet

Alt-saxophonist Ruslan Tustanovsky adheres closely in his work to the traditions first laid down in the middle of the last century by the jazz legends Charlie Parker and Sonny Stitt. Alongside his work in the Jazz Philharmonic Big Band, Tustanovsky also heads up his own quartet, where he performs traditional mainstream and bebop. In 2016 his album became the first Russian release to be reviewed in the US's leading influential internet resource All About Jazz.

Amy Pieterse

An artist with South African, Indian and Irish-American roots, her latest album Becoming Innocent — Love and Theory gives off contrasting notes of icy self-discipline and emotional abandon, with songs on the theme of love and friendship, all set in St Petersburg. The album is the result of three years of intensive collaboration with the musician and composer Dmitry Semenov. Their shared belief that music is the most direct way to achieve mutual understanding between people inspired many unique artists to become involved in the making of the album, including Ruslan Gadzhimuradov (sound producer), Grigory Voskoboinik (classical musician and composer), Alexander Makhnev (cult jazz pianist), and Dmitry Semenov (saxophonist). Amy Pieterse, aside from being a singer-songwriter, has also appeared in seven Russian and European films.

CINEMA

David Bowie: Finding Fame

(Francis Whately, 2019, UK, 91 min)

The third film by British director Francis Whately dedicated to the life and work of David Bowie. In his latest piece, Whately covers Bowie's first steps towards fame, from his school years up to the emergence of his alter-ego Ziggy Stardust, with all the failures and comical episodes which happened along the way.

Zazie dans le métro

(Louis Malle, 1960, France, 93 min)

This comedy by the cult director of the French «new wave» is based on Raymond Queneau's novel of the same name, and is outstanding for its liberal use of subtle visual humour, ingenious editing and convincing special effects.
